

De Sales

SPIRITUALITY CENTER

"Complaints: Good for the Soul?"

Mary D. Ford

Before we consider anything else, let's simply acknowledge the fact that, at some point or another, we've all done it. Complain, that is.

Defined as "to express feelings of pain, dissatisfaction or resentment," complaining may be as old as the human race itself. And to the extent that a pain, dissatisfaction or resentment may need to be addressed, complaining, if not necessarily an enjoyable or pleasant thing in itself, may sometimes be a necessary thing.

The problem with complaining is that it can all too easily move from a critique of life to a way of life. Complaining is a 'gateway' activity that can lead to grumbling ("to complain in a surly manner; to mutter discontentedly") and grumpiness, that is, to become chronically cranky and ill-tempered. Francis de Sales devoted a mere paragraph to this topic in his Introduction to the Devout Life. However short on words, it is long in wisdom: "Complain as little as possible about the wrongs that you suffer. Undoubtedly a person who complains commits a sin by doing so, since self-love always believes that injuries are worse than they really are." (Part III, Chapter 3) complaining leads to exaggeration. At its worst, chronic complaining leads to a distortion of the truth: also known as lying.

At the very least, constant

In a letter to a Madame de Peyzieu (October 1612), Francis de Sales made the following observation: "When we happen to complain about our neighbor (which ought to be a rare thing), we never leave off but begin the whole story over and over again, repeating our complaints and grievances endlessly. This is a sign of touchiness and of a heart that is not really healthy. By contrast, strong and staunch hearts only complain when there is something really important to complain about, and even then they do not harbor resentment, or, at least, they do not succumb to fuss and agitation." (Stopp, Selected Letters, p. 206)

Scripture itself describes dire consequences for chronic complainers. In the Book of Numbers (which tells of Israel's post-Egypt journey from Mt. Sinai to Canaan), we hear of two occasions on which, after complaining against God and Moses for having no food, the Israelites proceeded to complain about the quality of the very food that God, in his loving care, did provide. In one case, the "fire of the Lord burned among them and consumed some at the outskirts of their encampment." (11:1-3) In the second case, "the Lord sent venomous snakes among them; they bit the people, and many died." (21:4-7)

It is certainly not a stretch to consider how both fire and venom might represent the all-consuming and/or poisonous nature of constant complaining.

When legitimate complaints are warranted, we must be especially careful in choosing the people to whom the complaint is made: "Do so with those who are even-tempered and who really love God. Above all, do not complain to irascible or fault-finding persons, for instead of calming your mind they will stir up even worse difficulties, and in place of removing the thorn that is hurting you they will drive it even deeper into your foot." (Introduction, Part III, Chapter 3)

For her part, St. Jane de Chantal advised: "Be guileless and open toward everyone. Accept lovingly admonishments and corrections. Never complain, murmur or blame others." (Letters of Spiritual Direction, p. 261)

At times, each of us will need to address injury and injustice. May God give us the strength to air our complaints without becoming chronic complainers.